Physician and Advanced Practitioner opinions on mental health access

Every year, we survey physicians and advanced practitioners for their opinions on a specific healthcare topic. This year, we focused on access to mental health services.

According to Mental Health America, there is only one mental health provider for every 566 individuals. In states with the lowest access rates, ratios can be as high as one clinician for every 1,100 individuals. Not seeking treatment for mental illness—whether it be due to lack of access to psychiatrists, no insurance, or because patients fear the stigma a diagnosis brings—has high physical costs for patients. Sobering statistics show that 90 percent of children who die by suicide have a mental illness, and that mood disorders are the third most common reason for hospitalization for children and adults between the ages of 18-44.

See the data breakdown below to see how physicians and advanced practitioners felt about access to mental healthcare services, and how it can be improved.

“ We need more crisis care that can continue long enough to see people through their crisis and work with them through the transition back to their daily lives. ”

Methodology:

Invitations for the survey were emailed to a database of more than 80,000 individuals, which included physicians, nurse practitioners, physician assistants and CRNAs who have been placed by LocumTenens.com and those who have not. Respondents to all surveys were self-selected and spanned all 50 states and medical/surgical specialties. The response rate was 2.56 percent, with a +/- 3 percent error rate at a 95 percent confidence level.
